The approach that the Home Office uses to calculate the published unit costs for all UK visa, immigration and citizenship services takes into account the calculated estimate of the full financial cost for providing the relevant service, including direct costs; relevant local and central overheads, (e.g. accommodation, HR, Finance and IT); depreciation; cost of capital employed, and; other factors that are in connection to immigration and nationality, such as operational policy.

Productivities are then used, based on operational business planning data, to apportion the total cost across the range of services and products or alternatively, it also uses a methodology that allows an aggregation of all the individual costs specific to the product to provide a more detailed make up of cost.

Unit costs may be influenced by changes in the way that applications in certain routes are processed from year to year, for example where additional checks are introduced or required, or by changes elsewhere within the overall system which impact on the weighting calculations and therefore the amount apportioned to any individual service.

This methodology is permissible with fee setting powers contained within the Immigration and Nationality Act 2014.
